

High flow nasal cannula or non-invasive ventilation: when to use what?

Non-invasive ventilation has been used in adult intensive care for decades. In comparison, most intensivists have only started using the high flow nasal cannula in the last few years, if at all. This talk will review evidence which support or refute the role of these two modes of treatment for respiratory failure and suggest when one should be used over the other.